Working with layers The programs in the Adobe Creative Suite use a similar layer-based file format — specifically Adobe Photoshop and Adobe Illustrator. You create a file with one layer and then add more. When you're done, you turn off all but one of those layers and then save your file. Photoshop is a bit special in that you can also turn the individual layers into individual images. To turn a layer into an image file, you place a photo or other graphic on a layer. When you save that layer, the program saves the layer as a JPEG or another image format. You can also use Photoshop to manipulate photos using layers. For example, you can resize a layer while keeping the rest of the file the same size. You can merge several images together onto a single layer, or you can use layer masks to control which areas of the layer are visible and which are hidden. The layers are organized into groups called panels. A panel is used to apply a common effect or style to several layers, such as creating shadows and highlights. You can create custom panels from a mix of adjustment, filter, and other tools. Photoshop does a lot more than just manipulate images. It has a tutorial, called the Edge Layers panel, where you can find complex tutorials and references to the Adobe Edge Web Design tool. ## GIMP and Other Free Image Editing Tools If you don't want to use the proprietary programs in the Creative Suite, you can get a very nice collection of tools for free from the popular _gimp.org_ website. The GIMP is the GNU Image Manipulation Program. You can download a free version of GIMP at the website, and then you can download commercial packages that add more features (not to mention enhance your tools). Although GIMP does support layers, you can't turn individual layers into images. You also can't perform the sophisticated editing tasks that Photoshop does. However, you can resize individual images, perform simple color correction and cropping, enhance image contrast, and make various changes to JPEG and other image formats. You can also draw, add text, and perform simple blurring and resizing using the filter tools. If you're looking for a tool that can manipulate raster images, consider trying IrfanView or

Q: bazel: How to build dynamic object in an object json file I have a json file of objects of the following structure: { "key1": { "foo": 10, "bar": 15 } } { "key2": { "foo": 20, "bar": 30 } } How can I build a bazel project from this json file? A: Since the API doesn't seem to support building from json, I ended up writing my own. You simply pass the json as --files flag. Here's how I do it in Go: // parseJSON is the package I wrote to parse json // Keep in mind, that I use the lower bounds for the json lib as the origin. // I don't know the upper bounds func parseJSON(filename string, group *Package, p *Package, buildFlags map[string]*c.BuildFlag, config map[string]*c.Config) (*c.Build, error) { config["//:build_file_prefix"] = group.Package var pkg *c.Package for _, json_file := range glob.Glob(filename) { file, err := os.Open(json_file) if err != nil { log.Printf("cannot open file: %s", json_file) } else { data, err := ioutil.ReadAll(file) if err != nil { log.Printf("cannot read file: %s", json_file) } else { err = json.Unmarshal(data, &pkg) if err != nil { log.Printf("cannot parse file: %s", json_

The Truth About Local Food You want to know the origins of your food, but you also want to know where it's grown. What can we do to take control of our food? Thankfully, we live in a time when both conventional and nonconventional methods of growing food are being implemented. Why are some local? Are there any downsides? The Importance of Local Food According to a report by the UN, 24 percent of people worldwide are undernourished. Out of those, 53 million are undernourished in developing nations. They suffer from a lack of food that they do not always have access to. Well, if you have a serious issue with food, what can you do? Think about the food that you consume. Is it fresh? Organic? Can you find the sources? Do you know where that food comes from? Who grew it? These are all questions that people can be sensitive about. Local food is not just about where a food is grown; it is about its quality. This means that when you buy local, you can be assured that your food is raised the way that you want it. If it isn't organic, it is almost assuredly going to be locally grown. This is a big benefit, because most of the times that we buy food, we buy it prepared. So, if it is locally grown, then it is probably fresh, but if it is not organic, then it's either prepared by a local farm or it is shipped in from somewhere else. In either case, you are not assured that the food is actually where you want it to be. Second, local food is much more economical. All of the time, a local farm is going to be cheaper than the average grocery store. But that means that the farm is going to be spending money on raw ingredients. It would cost less to grow produce if you didn't have to spend as much on fertilizer. There are also less opportunities for synthetic chemicals in organic food. While this is true in a general sense, it also costs money. When you are eating local, you are not paying as much money for your food. If you don't want to eat local, you can always go to your local farmers market and get whatever is available. This has a lot of benefits. First, you are getting fresh produce that you want. It's not going to be something that you have never seen
